

The opportunity is emotion at category-leader scale.

A competitive read for Trex. Three active brands in market, one going dark. The category leader is doing the most things; the #2 is doing the most distinctive thing. The emotional ground is being claimed — and Trex has the assets to defend it.

Window: 2026-06-01 to 2026-06-08. Subject: Trex. Set: TimberTech (AZEK), Fiberon, Deckorators.

A read from what's actually running in market, not from press releases or product pages. The job is to surface the moves worth making, not to score the week.

01 · THE READ

The category right now

The single most useful frame is this: composite decking is a 25-year purchase, and the marketing playing out across all four brands knows it. No competitor in the set ran a discount, a rebate, a financing offer, or a seasonal promo this week. Zero offer rows across the entire competitive corpus. Every active brand is in brand-build and lead-capture mode — free samples, find-a-contractor, product-attribute proof, lead-magnet PDFs — not in promo-cycle mode. This is rational. Most composite-deck buyers aren't in market in any given week; the marketing job is to be the brand they remember 6 to 18 months from now when they finally call a contractor. (Ehrenberg-Bass on category buyers: most of your future revenue is light/non-buyers right now; reach and mental availability matter more than short-term conversion.)

Given that frame, the most important second observation: only Trex is running a true mass-reach DTC playbook in this set. TimberTech is close but more concentrated. Fiberon is dark this window. Deckorators is running a tight programmatic flight (most ads carry DoubleClick tracking — likely served via DCM, inferred) with consolidated creative. The competitive set is structurally asymmetric, and the strategic shape of the asymmetry matters more than any one creative move:

BRAND	VOLUME	WHAT THEY'RE PLAYING
Trex	200 ads	Mass reach + product news engine. Two simultaneous product launches in the window.
TimberTech	115 ads	Concentrated brand-build + free-sample funnel. Most differentiated brand-side message in the set.
Deckorators	41 ads	Single-idea distinctive-asset campaign at scale, with Quebec localization.
Fiberon	0 ads (this window)	Dark on Meta. Possibly paused, possibly running through pages our corpus doesn't track (inferred).

Three real strategies, three real playbooks. The interesting tension is that the most differentiated message in the set isn't Trex's — it's TimberTech's. That's worth sitting with.

CATEGORY POSITIONING

Trex owns DTC scale alone. TimberTech is taking the emotional ground. Deckorators is building a disciplined distinctive-asset play. Fiberon is dark in the window — a competitive vacancy.

TOTAL ADS OBSERVED PER BRAND · META AD LIBRARY · 7-DAY WINDOW

What's actually happening in each competitor's voice

TimberTech is running the most interesting brand play

TimberTech has built a named-contractor and named-homeowner testimonial engine ("Taylor," "Donald," "Larissa," "Lonny" — ads 2722079094833334, 941840192239221, 1544005797069153, 1140285271639157) paired with explicit "what contractors choose for their own homes" framing (1862181017760266, 2820770581606616). This is doing two things at once. It's neutralizing the homeowner's biggest unspoken anxiety — "am I making the choice a real expert would make?" — and it's building a distinctive social-proof scaffolding that competitors can't easily replicate without recasting their entire creative tone.

The taxonomy data sharpens this read: TimberTech is 86% lifestyle / 79% aesthetic hook / 68% emotional appeal across analyzed creatives. Trex by contrast is 53% lifestyle / 32% aesthetic / 30% emotional / 61% rational. The two brands are running fundamentally different creative postures into the same category buyers. TimberTech is making people feel; Trex is making people understand. Brand science (Binet & Field's long-and-short-of-it work) is consistent that emotional creative outperforms rational creative for long-term brand growth in mass categories — and composite decking is a mass category. TimberTech is taking the emotional ground, and if Trex stays on specs-and-proof points for another two quarters, that ground compounds.

The supporting layer is also working: TimberTech is pushing fire-resistance ("top-rated fire resistance" — 1538061804511207), moisture resistance (2017366178911351), and 85% recycled content (993826973090572) under their Advanced PVC story. The product attributes feed the lifestyle creative; they aren't the headline. That's the right hierarchy for a category that buys on emotion and rationalizes with specs.

Deckorators is building one of the cleaner distinctive-asset plays in home improvement

Fifteen-plus near-duplicate variants of "Stand Out"™ / Word on the street / The neighbors will notice" across English, French-Canadian, and US/Canada splits (993312766712777, 28091445597111572, 955875424004471, 1683394976131723). This is brand-asset discipline at scale — Byron Sharp would approve. A single brand idea, expressed with consistent visual coding (bold typography, brand-red accents, "Stand Out" lockup), distributed broadly. The product proof is layered underneath: 50-year structural warranty (1682617066184189), Surestone tech, 35+ color/width combos, the slip-resistant Voyage line. The brand promise is emotional and aspirational ("the neighbors will notice"); the product promise is rational and exhaustive.

Deckorators is also the only brand running French-Canadian creative ("Vos voisins ne manqueront pas de la remarquer" — 955875424004471). That's not a token gesture; it's segment-aware budget allocation. They're playing depth in chosen markets, not breadth across the US.

Fiberon being dark is a real signal

Zero new Meta ads in the window. Eleven homepage images cumulatively. No promo activity. Either Fortune Brands has paused Fiberon paid media, or they're running through a channel we don't capture, or they've shifted into a non-Meta tactic (Pinterest, Houzz, paid search).

This is worth noting because it means there are effectively three live brand-build players in the US Meta surface, not four. That changes the share-of-voice math.

Trex is running a category-expansion play, not just an SKU-expansion play

This is the most important read for Trex's own strategic moment. The two product launches in the window — Refuge (fire-resistant) and the submersible/marine-grade decking for docks — aren't line extensions. They're category-expansion moves into adjacent buyer pools that didn't previously consider Trex.

Refuge brings in wildfire-zone homeowners (California, parts of Oregon, Washington, Colorado, fire-coded counties in Texas) who previously thought composite was a fire risk. Marine-grade brings in dock owners (Great Lakes, Florida coast, Northeast lakes) who weren't buying any composite — they were buying treated wood or trying IPE. The dealer co-op flight with named regionals (Kuiken Bros, Ganahl Lumber, Abbe Lumber, Buildpro — 275 24344573830305, 1684218619246530) under a tracked campaign code (TIU-5T8) suggests Trex is treating this as a regional ground-game, not just a paid-media flight.

Read the corpus as a single statement and Trex is saying: we are the brand that's expanding what composite decking can be. That's a powerful position for a category leader to hold — Byron Sharp's "buy the category, sell the brand" — but the creative tone of the announcements is currently engineering-led rather than emotional. The opportunity Trex is leaving on the table is to frame these product launches as cultural moves (the family in the wildfire-zone neighborhood that's finally building the backyard they wanted; the lake-house owner whose dock outlives the boat) rather than as technical moves.

Competitive tone — the map

- Trex = engineering credibility + DTC mass reach + category-expansion ambition
- TimberTech = aspirational lifestyle + contractor authority + emotional brand-build
- Deckorators = distinctive-asset discipline + Quebec depth + product-warranty proof
- Fiberon = absent

The map's structural tension is this: Trex is doing the most things, TimberTech is doing the most distinctive thing, and Deckorators is doing the most disciplined thing. Trex is the category-leader playing the category-leader's game (reach, news, breadth) — which is the correct game for the share leader to play. But the creative tone is leaving emotional and aspirational territory to TimberTech, and the brand-asset discipline territory to Deckorators. Trex is the biggest brand in the set without a single distinctive memory structure it owns the way Wendy's owns Wendy, Allstate owns "Are you in good hands," or — within home — Sherwin-Williams owns "Cover the Earth." Trex owns the category name (most consumers say "Trex" the way they say "Kleenex"), but that's a fragile asset to lean on permanently — it's why TimberTech's contractor-testimonial engine is dangerous over a 2-3 year horizon.

CREATIVE DNA · PHOTOGRAPHY-STYLE MIX PER BRAND (% OF ANALYZED CREATIVES)

EMOTIONAL VS. RATIONAL APPEAL PER BRAND (% OF ANALYZED CREATIVES)

04 · THE OPENING

Whitespace — the lanes nobody is in

Some of these are tactical; some are structural. The structural ones matter more.

Structural openings:

1. Emotional, aspirational video. The entire competitive set is static-image dominant. Trex has the rawest assets for emotional video — the dock/marine “torture tests” (“2 million sq. ft. since 2010” claim — 2035309764078050, 950479117829275), the wildfire-resistance category-defining product, the regional dealer ground game. None of these has been cut as a 15-30 second vertical Meta or YouTube Shorts asset that makes someone feel something about their backyard. Brand science says video + emotion is where long-term brand growth lives, and the entire set is conceding the lane.

2. US-Spanish language at scale. Deckorators owns French Quebec; nobody is in US-Spanish. Composite-decking buyers in TX, FL, CA, AZ skew bilingual or Spanish-dominant in fast-growing exurban markets where decks are part of the new-home buyer journey. The contractor side of the market is also heavily Hispanic in those geographies — Trex Pro Spanish-language outreach would have low competitive friction.

3. Pool deck / outdoor-kitchen adjacency. Trex owns docks/marine; nobody is targeting pool builders or outdoor-kitchen contractors as a distinct segment. “Pool-safe, heat-reflective, slip-resistant” is a frame the existing product line can credibly carry, and it opens a contractor pool (pool builders) that the rest of the set isn’t recruiting through.

Tactical openings:

4. The fire-resistance defense window is closing. TimberTech is making the “top-rated fire resistance” claim now (1538061804511207) in the same week Trex is launching Refuge. If TimberTech runs that claim unchallenged for two more quarters, “fire-resistant composite decking” becomes mentally associated with TimberTech for a non-trivial share of West-Coast buyers. Trex has the better product story (Refuge is purpose-built; TimberTech’s claim is general Advanced PVC) but story doesn’t win — frequency wins. This is the highest-urgency tactical move in the entire set right now.

5. A single time-bound incentive. Zero offers across the four brands all week. A 14-day “free sample + free design consult, order by [date]” doesn’t break Trex’s premium brand if it’s framed as a season-kickoff service offer rather than a discount. The friction is near-zero; the lift potential is real precisely because the rest of the category has trained itself to ignore offers.

6. Honest cost-transparency content. Trex has a calculator (949789881243921 , 1391468836052052) but no narrative content around it. “What a 400-square-foot Trex deck actually costs in 2026, broken out by line item” published as a Reel or carousel would do two things: it would build trust in a category notorious for opaque pricing, and it would pull the upper-funnel “research mode” buyer who’s currently bouncing between Reddit threads and Houzz galleries. The risk is small — you can always pull back if margins are sensitive — and the brand-trust upside is meaningful.

7. Amazon brand-store activation. All four brands have zero brand_store_changes detected this window. Composite-decking isn’t an Amazon category in the traditional SKU-checkout sense, but Amazon is increasingly where in-market homeowners discover and research building products. A Trex storefront refresh tied to sample-kit SKUs and Sponsored Brand video against “composite decking” and “Trex sample” queries would capture consideration traffic the rest of the set isn’t defending.

05 • THE PUSH

Where I’d push the brand

I’d push Trex toward “the brand that’s expanding what composite decking can be — for the homes you actually live in” and treat the next four quarters as building the emotional and category-expansion proof points that turn the existing category leadership into a durable brand position.

The components are already there: the two new products (Refuge, marine-grade), the dealer ground game (TIU-5T8 dealer co-op), the calculator and sample-funnel infrastructure, the TrexPro contractor network. What's missing is the emotional creative envelope — the wildfire-zone family, the lake-house grandfather, the contractor who put Trex Refuge on his own house — that turns the engineering story into a brand story. TimberTech is currently filling that envelope with their own contractor-testimonial work, and the longer Trex stays in spec-led tone, the more TimberTech gets to define what emotional decking creative looks like in the category.

Four things I'd start this quarter:

First, defend the fire-resistance narrative immediately and emotionally. Not a "we're better" comparison — a 15-30 second vertical video featuring a real homeowner in a wildfire-coded county (CA, OR, CO) whose deck survived the 2025 season, anchored by Refuge product. The product is the proof, but the protagonist is the family. Brief the creative team toward "what it feels like to not have to worry" rather than "ignition temperature comparison." This is the single highest-leverage move in the recommended set because it competes with TimberTech for the same emotional ground while it's still uncontested.

Second, stand up the dock/marine product line as a category-redefining campaign, not as a product launch. The "2 million sq. ft. since 2010" claim is enormous and it's currently buried in static creative. A "Trex Built These Docks" multi-market documentary-style series — Great Lakes, Florida coast, New England — would do for Trex's marine line what Patagonia's environmental films did for their brand: it would prove the credibility through narrative, not assertion. This is a 6-12 month investment, not a quarter, but it's the kind of brand-build that compounds.

Third, commit to US-Spanish creative across both the contractor side (TrexPro) and the homeowner side (sample funnel). Deckorators has demonstrated that the operational lift of localized creative is manageable. The audience opportunity in TX/FL/CA/AZ is real. Nobody else is in this lane.

Fourth, publish a single, calm, honest piece of cost-transparency content that lives on the website and gets cut into Meta and YouTube. Not the calculator landing page — narrative content. "Here's what 400 square feet of Trex actually costs, here's why, here's what you could save by doing X." Trust in this category is the slowest-built asset; the brand that takes the risk to be honest about price gets disproportionate trust upside.

A note on what I can't tell you: this is a content-pattern read, not a measurement read. Trex's actual media-mix model might be telling them that the static-image flight is converting at a rate that justifies the current creative posture. The dealer co-op (TIU-5T8) might be a tested-and-working CPL play we shouldn't disrupt. The product launches might have go-to-market sequencing logic we can't see — Refuge may be in a controlled launch where awareness restraint is intentional. Push the brand the direction above because that's where the content map says the opening is. But the brand team has business context I don't, and that context wins when it conflicts with a content-pattern read.

SITE CONTENT DEEP-DIVE

What each brand is actually saying on its homepage

Per-brand structured read of the live homepage — headline, primary CTA, messaging stance, what's working, what's missing. Grounded in direct reads of each landing hero and the captured visible-text excerpts.

TREX

CONF 90%

Trex's homepage runs the category-leader playbook properly — aesthetic moment in the hero, free samples threaded everywhere, segmented pro entry — but every differentiation moat the brand is building in paid Meta (Refuge, marine, recycled) is left out of the owned-channel story.

Order up to 5 FREE decking samples

Meet the Color Defining 2026

Biscayne brings driftwood tones and quiet sophistication to your outdoor space.

PRIMARY CTA

Shop Samples

SECONDARY (4)

See All Shades

Get a Quote

Order Samples

Order up to 5 FREE decking samples

appeal mixed

signal premium

leads brand_story

tone aspirational

POSITIONING READ

Trex runs the category-leader playbook explicitly — leading with the '2026 Color of the Year' (Biscayne) is borrowing the Pantone playbook to make a SKU launch culturally meaningful. The hero is aesthetic-first (a person enjoying the deck, not the deck itself); the buying-funnel infrastructure (free samples, TrexPro contractors, calculator, visualizer) sits underneath as a complete journey-scaffold. This is positioning as the brand that defines what good decking looks like.

WHAT WORKS

WHAT IT MISSES

- Leads with brand-equity moment (Color of the Year) rather than promo — appropriate for a category-leader with a 6-18 month buying cycle; Ehrenberg-Bass would call this mental-availability-first marketing
- Free-sample offer placed at every entry point (announcement bar, hero CTA, utility nav) — the lowest-friction conversion funnel of any brand in the decking set
- Pro/consumer segmentation is clean — 'For Professionals' has its own utility entry without diluting the consumer hero
- Zero urgency — no end date on the Color of the Year campaign, no scarcity, no seasonal tentpole framing in early deck-build season
- The hero is beautiful but says nothing about the actual product differentiation (Refuge fire-resistant, marine-grade, recycled content) that paid Meta IS pushing — owned and paid channels are out of sync
- No US-Spanish language option in nav (Deckorators offers FR; nobody offers Spanish despite TX/FL/CA being core deck markets with Hispanic majority counties)

► DESIGN NOTES

TIMBERTECH

CONF 89%

TimberTech runs the most editorially confident homepage in the set — a single line, a single button, a styled corner — and it's the only brand explicitly courting architects, but the fire-resistance and contractor-authority equity it's compounding in paid Meta is missing from the owned hero.

Order Free Samples

The beauty of wood without the upkeep

PRIMARY CTA

Start Your Deck Project

SECONDARY (6)

Order Free Samples

Find a Contractor

Request a Quote

For Pros

For Architects

Explore the Technology

appeal emotional

signal premium

leads brand_story

tone intimate

POSITIONING READ

TimberTech positions itself as the design-conscious alternative to natural wood — a single confident headline ('The beauty of wood without the upkeep') sits over an intimate styled corner (basket + plant on warm-tone decking) with a single dark-pill CTA. The secondary frame is service-led: 'Start Your Deck Project' implies hand-holding through the planning phase, reinforced by both Architect and Pro entries in utility nav.

WHAT WORKS

WHAT IT MISSES

- Single confident headline + single CTA hero — high editorial discipline that mirrors the brand-build paid-Meta tone
- Architect-specific entry point is competitively unique — claiming the upstream specifier audience nobody else is courting
- 'The beauty of wood without the upkeep' is the cleanest single category-of-one positioning statement of any homepage in either competitive set
- Zero urgency / no time-bound offer — same gap as the rest of the set, but more conspicuous given the elegant brand system that could carry a tasteful tentpole
- Fire Resistance is buried in the Decking submenu despite being a paid-Meta hero claim ('top-rated fire resistance') — owned channel under-leverages the differentiation paid is building
- No people in hero — the contractor-testimonial engine that's the most distinctive thing in paid Meta isn't reflected in the homepage's visual choice

► DESIGN NOTES

DECKORATORS

CONF 86%

Deckorators runs the most disciplined owned-channel system in the set — brand tagline threaded from <title> to hero to Meta — but the bold 'Stand Out™' equity it's building in paid Meta is held back from the homepage in favor of a quieter corporate tagline.

Free Samples · Shipping Included

DESIGNED TO ENDURE. BUILT TO ENJOY.

Advanced decking and railing solutions engineered to outperform wear and tear, every time.

PRIMARY CTA

Explore Our Products

SECONDARY (7)

Shop Free Samples

Shop Free Samples · Shipping Included

Where to Buy

Find a Builder

Order Free Samples

Connect with a Contractor

appeal mixed

signal premium

leads brand_story

tone authoritative

POSITIONING READ

Deckorators is the only brand in either deck that puts its actual brand tagline ('Designed to Endure. Built to Enjoy.') in the page <title> AND the hero headline — full alignment between owned-channel SEO, brand positioning, and visual hierarchy. The hero is restrained: a single lifestyle deck scene, white sans-serif overlay, single outline CTA. The four-column feature row below (Technology, Warranty, Durability, Color & Style) signals a structured, catalog-like buying journey.

WHAT WORKS

- Tightest brand-system alignment in the set — page title, hero headline, paid Meta 'Stand Out™' lockup all share the same visual DNA
- Free Samples + Shipping Included as a combined value prop — only brand in the set tying both into a single offer line
- Quebec French regional selector is a real localization investment, not a token gesture

WHAT IT MISSES

- Regional selector modal blocks the hero on first-visit for many users — design-critique limitation that means our analysis represents a returning user's view, not first-time
- The bold 'Stand Out / Word on the street' campaign equity in paid Meta isn't echoed verbatim in the hero — owned channel reverts to the corporate 'Designed to Endure' tagline rather than amplifying the bolder paid line
- Four-column feature row below the hero is text-heavy — reads more like a catalog index than a journey; could be reframed as visual proof

► DESIGN NOTES

Fiberon is running a product-launch homepage (Novus™) with no paid-Meta wind in its sails — owned channel is doing the work alone, and the parent-brand portfolio strip creates brand-architecture noise the consumer can't decode.

Introducing NOVUS™ Composite Decking

Experience a story in every board with Novus™ fused composite decking. Each deck board features the captivating appearance of real wood with a slip-resistant surface that's engineered to last.

PRIMARY CTA

Explore Novus

SECONDARY (7)

Order Samples

Find An Installer

Find A Dealer

Pro Center

Explore Railing

Explore Lighting

appeal rational

signal premium

leads product

tone transactional

POSITIONING READ

Fiberon is positioning the homepage around a new product launch — Novus™ fused composite decking. The headline carries the product name rather than a positioning claim. Above the nav, a Fortune Brands sibling-logo strip (Therma-Tru Doors, LaMason, fiberon, Fypon, SolarInnovations) signals a corporate-portfolio play: the brand is communicating credibility-by-association rather than standalone identity. This is the homepage of a B2B-aware brand pretending to be a consumer brand.

WHAT WORKS

- Product-launch hero is fast — a homeowner arriving from a Novus-promoted source lands directly on the matching message
- Below-the-fold cards segment by adjacent product category (Railing, Lighting) without leaving the homepage — keeps the consumer in-funnel
- Italic lowercase 'fiberon' wordmark is a real distinctive asset

WHAT IT MISSES

- No active Meta advertising in market this window — homepage traffic is essentially unsupported by paid media (verified via `ads_library_search`)
- The parent-brand sibling strip is consumer-noise — it serves B2B specifiers but confuses the homeowner buyer journey
- No people in the hero, no testimonials in the first viewport — emotion is reserved for below-the-fold cards where it competes with product-launch noise

► DESIGN NOTES

CAPTURE LIMITATIONS TO KNOW ABOUT

- Hero crop is bounded at 1500px tall — multi-fold sections below the visible hero (testimonials, FAQs, secondary product modules) are not in the homepage analysis. They are in the per-image creative taxonomy, but framed as image-only rather than as full-context site content.
- Regional selectors block first-visit captures — Deckorators's English/Français selector and similar interstitials mean some brands' "first hero" is actually a returning-user view. The captured hero may differ from a cold visitor's experience.
- Page-level CTA buttons aren't always in the captured images — the `homepage_image` taxonomy reads CTAs only when they appear inside a captured creative tile. Header / floating / sticky-bar CTAs visible on the live site can be missing.
- Hand-authored fallback in use — the automated homepage-analysis LLM pipeline (`homepage_promos` via Anthropic API) is offline pending an API key. The analyses surfaced here were authored inline by Claude from direct reads of each landing_hero.png + the captured visible-text / regions / per-image taxonomy — re-runnable manually but not nightly.

- Live A/B tests and personalization are invisible — most sites in the set run experiments. The captured hero is a single observation, not a representative sample of what every visitor sees.

REFERENCE BOARD

The evidence, organized by strategic theme

Curated thumbnails from the analyzed corpus. Captions are hand-written interpretations — what each reference illustrates strategically, not what the ad itself says. Click any thumbnail to open the original in Meta Ad Library.

Trex's category-expansion plays

Two product launches in one week — both opening adjacent buyer pools that didn't previously consider composite decking. The creative is engineering-led; the opportunity is emotional.

TREX

#1010053428128216

Trex Refuge fire-resistant launch. Product is the proof, but the protagonist (a wildfire-zone family) is missing.

TREX

#1328248300131707

'Where fire resistance and West Coast-inspired design come together.' The aspirational lane Trex could lean into harder.

TREX

#1284398363250516

Marine-grade dock claim: '2 million sq. ft. of waterfront.' Enormous proof point sitting inside static creative.

TREX

#1275384814734769

Dock-specific product spec ad. The use case is uncontested in the set — no peer is targeting marine.

Deckorators's distinctive-asset discipline

A single brand idea — Stand Out™ / 'the neighbors will notice' — expressed with consistent typography, bold layouts, and US/Quebec localization. The most disciplined creative system in the set.

DECKORATORS

#2040803979833111

The flagship Stand Out™ lockup. Distinctive type treatment, consistent across the campaign.

DECKORATORS

#955875424004471

Quebec French localization. Same campaign, different market — disciplined segment-aware deployment.

DECKORATORS

#1683394976131723

Quebec variant of 'Word on the street' — localized line, same brand asset.

TimberTech's lifestyle-first brand-build

86% lifestyle, 79% aesthetic hook, 68% emotional appeal. TimberTech is taking emotional ground in a category where the rest of the set is in spec mode.

TIMBERTECH

#1187361900089634

Deck Design Guide lead magnet. Lifestyle-led, low-friction entry into the long buying journey.

TIMBERTECH

#1590401239756102

Same campaign in a different aspirational frame. TimberTech treats the design phase as the seduction layer.

Trex's existing funnel infrastructure — ripe to expand

Sample funnel, cost calculator, TrexPro contractor finder. The pieces are built and converting; the opportunity is to wrap them in emotional creative and localized variants.

TREX

#1016884224184199

Sample-funnel hero: 'Feel it, see it, test it.' Existing creative that could carry an offer overlay or Spanish-language cut.

TREX

#1231724215059714

Cost calculator funnel. The narrative version ('what 400 sq ft actually costs') would outperform the tool itself.

Methodology note: This read draws on the 2026-06-01 to 2026-06-08 briefing (ad-archive-id-cited specifics in reports/trex/2026-06-09/briefing.md) and the Brand vs Brand taxonomy distributions in the dashboard (reports/trex/2026-06-09/dashboard/index.html). The data reflects what brands are choosing to put into market on Meta and their public homepages, not measurement of whether those choices are converting. Brand-science references: Ehrenberg-Bass on category buyers (most future revenue is light/non-buyers, mental availability beats targeting); Byron Sharp on distinctive brand assets; Binet & Field on emotional vs. rational creative balance for long-term growth. Fiberon's absence in the window is itself a finding and is treated as such, not interpolated.